“ Pinto beans... Well me and Jess shared many suppers. We lived a block apart and I am not a fan of cooking. I have grown with it but at the time i hated it. Dayton and Jackson were little. She had cooked a whole pot of beans and spilled them i the floor. So we sat in the floor and made our own little pile. Lol. The kids ate random beans where ever they landed. But her and i sat there and ate pintos right out of the floor with good ole cornbread of course. My favorite memory. They were as good as my grandmothers beans and if you ever ate Viola Woodard's pinto beans you would understand what i am talking about. Like the best in the world!! NO LIE!! Jess cooked just like her. That's what her daddy taught her. That is my favorite memory. She loved to cook and knew she was good at it. Rest easy sister. I love you so much.

“ Jessica was a very strong woman. As a Tennessee State Trooper, I have made many next of kin notifications in my career. I still remember every vivid detail of knocking on Jessica’s door in the early hours of the morning and telling her that her husband had been killed in a motorcycle crash. We bonded at that tragic moment in time and we called each other from time to time. Despite all of her challenges, she would always tell me she was praying for me; that’s just who Jessica was. Life certainly sent many curve balls Jessica’s way, but she negotiated every wild pitch with dignity and grace! Hopefully I will meet Jessica again, WALKING the streets of gold!
